1. PRESS RELEASE

Entitled « Autres Rivages », the exhibition will bring together around thirty recent paintings, ranging from small canvases painted en plein air to large, monumental formats, most of them inspired by the shorelines that Guy de Malherbe tirelessly explores. The cliffs of the Pays de Caux, from Étretat to Varengeville, are one of the essential sources of inspiration for his work. Guy de Malherbe regularly stays there to immerse himself in the powerful spectacle of the sea crashing against the impressive walls of white chalk.

The shoreline, where this constant clash of the elements unfolds, is a privileged site for an awareness of nature and the issues that concern it; it gives a sense of time and space and brings us back to an awareness of finitude.

To paint en plein air is to become one with this shoreline and to attempt the mad undertaking of fixing what is in motion, the current, the light, the erosion.

In a second stage, back in the studio, Guy de Malherbe uses the small format paintings brought back from the shoreline to “make painting.”

In these new canvases, he interprets the landscape, blending the memory of other shores, those of the coves of Cadaqués or the colored ice cliffs of the Perito Moreno glacier in Argentina.

Thus, the painter appropriates the landscape, turning away from description in order to let it emerge.

The motif then becomes an enigma to be resolved. Anthropomorphic rocks, floating bodies and incandescent cliffs form so many visions in which the visible opens onto the imaginary.

The exhibition invites visitors to explore these shores of Guy de Malherbe and to share the world revealed by his painting, where the emotion of color and material blends with the unconscious and with dreams.

Guy de Malherbe’s works are held in French national collections including the CNAP, the Manufacture Nationale des Gobelins and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and are also part of major private collections.

Numerous museums have devoted solo exhibitions to his work, including the Musée du Mans, the Musée d’Évreux, the Musée de Trouville, the Abbaye de l’Épau and the Chartreuse de Villeneuve lès Avignon. His work has been regularly exhibited in the United States. He is represented in Switzerland by Galerie Ditesheim-Maffei, and in France and Belgium by Galerie La Forest Divonne.

PREFACE BY OLIVIER KAEPELIN

To look at the works of Guy de Malherbe is to sense a secret that emerges in a roundabout way. What I see first reassures me, because I believe that I am carrying on a casual dialogue with reality, with recognisable objects: ‘reliefs’ – the remains of a meal, the contours of a beach or those of a woman’s body. Are these ‘reliefs’ tangible forms? Not in the least. They do not ignore sculpture; they confound it. In front of me are the voids and masses of a rock and the undulations of a dune that, shaped by shadow and light, I imagine approaching. Illusions, accentuated by brushstrokes, shift reality from one medium to another, thereby enabling us to escape it. Rather than emphasising density, they weaken it by creating gaps and openings from which the abyss or void sometimes emerges.

By degrees, the painting comes together and comes apart. This is not an authoritarian injunction, but a dance from one foot to the other. While the ‘reliefs’ here are volumes, they are also remains – the remains left behind by time, tides and erosion – that reveal a strange anima, of chaos and the ambivalence between life and death, embodied in the captivating and melancholic figure of the stele. A keen poetry reader, Guy de Malherbe chooses his words with care. Like the views he depicts, his titles open up territories for his work. He plays with multiple meanings and forms using vocabulary that is deliberately neutral and ‘open’ to painting and, as in Markus Lüpertz’s work, the induced paradoxes blur the lines, preserving the puzzle. A landscape is never what it appears to be. Nothing can be assumed; everything is open to interpretation. He invites me to abandon the appearance of things, to wake up and to surrender myself with wonder to the business of contemplation. A contemplation that is happy to escape the snare of blinding repetition. Everything seems familiar, but the painter sows clues on the surface of the visible to entice me to take the risk of venturing into the depths of what can be seen: the lines, the values, the unfinished forms, the antagonism of orientations, the collapse of figures, as well as the inversions of top and bottom and the disorder of the ground held in check by the rectilinear order of the cliffs. That is where the secret lies, for what we thought we had seen in the genres of art history, and in the codes and colours, becomes a world in which memory, the unconscious and chimeras are given free rein. There emerge interpretations of beings, distant worlds, dreamlike lights, obscure nights, dark matter challenged by the whiteness and orderliness of the cliff walls, asserting their solidity.

Although Guy de Malherbe sometimes creates ‘ruptured’ perspectives with sharp edges that open up the background of the painting, or steeply inclined verticals that encourage us to look up, his spaces are more usually shaped by the intensity and quivering of the horizontals. He waits for something to emerge from the horizontal lines that structure his canvases.

During a conversation, he confessed to me that he was haunted by a desire to paint Ophelia, the body emerging from a form that the painting revives on the horizon. I imagine a future painting that will resemble the vivid and complex lines of poetry penned by Apollinaire:

«You float on nocturnal waves
The flame is my own heart reversed Coloured as that comb's tortoiseshell
The wave that bathes you mirrors well»

Guillaume Apollinaire, «Vitam impendere amori» (Trans. A.S. Kline)
